Abstract:

This lecture examines the networks of the Zurich raw silk trader Hermann Siber (1842–1918). From 1866, together with Caspar Brennwald, he established one of the first Swiss trading houses in Japan, which later became SiberHegner and which eventually became part of the trading giant DKSH. The lecture draws on Siber's correspondence with his Zurich-based brother, a previously unexplored set of sources providing insight into Hermann Siber's complex relationships with both Europeans and Asians. The lecture argues that in addition to the networks of family capitalism, friendships were of central importance in order to establish a transcontinental trading house in the 19th century. This will be explored using the example of Hermann Siber's relationship with the Japanese entrepreneur Furukawa Ichibé (1832–1903), the founder of the Furukawa Group.
